HONOURABLE MEMBER FOR BRENT

MP PAUL BOATENG

THIS IS Leftie Labour MP Paul Boateng making an ass of himself on stage—as a lewd law lord.

He had a 2,000-strong audience—including many gays and lesbians—roaring when he pulled back his gown to reveal a brief, black and bulging G-string.

The crude picture has landed Boateng, a leading Methodist, in hot water with the World Council of Churches.

Boateng, 36, is a Vice Moderator of the body and an official said:

"We expect someone in his position to behave with a little more dignity."

Boateng, a solicitor, sits on Labour's committee on crime and policing and was a member of the Police Training Council.

He won Brent South with a 7,931 majority.

Even some of bewigged Boateng's cronies were shocked at his amazing antics during the thrash at London's County Hall.

Fellow Left-wing MP "Red" Ken Livingstone—dressed up as Robin Hood—was stunned into silence by his colleague's raunchy rig-out.

Boateng is no stranger to controversy—he broke House of Commons rules in his maiden speech by attacking Government policy on the inner cities in a foreign affairs debate.

When asked about the picture yesterday, Boateng said angrily: "I don't talk to the News of the World."

Tory MP Geoffrey Dickens stormed last night: "No one wants to see their MP carry on like a drag queen—no wonder we're nervous of letting TV cameras into Parliament."

Nationalist comment WHAT WE THINK on the month's news

Whose pygmies are the most pygmy?

It is American primary time and, as is customary, our media are submitting us to the big yawn of US politics, reported as if they had the same importance to us as a general election in our own country. George Gordon, writing for the Daily Mail from New Hampshire, USA, headed his article 'The battle of the pygmies' and proceeded to comment scathingly on the mediocre qualities on the competing candidates, saying: "It is now clear that a first-class power must inevitably elect a second if not third-class president... So perhaps it is symbolic that George Bush for the Republicans and Michael Dukakis for the Democrats should come out on top of the assorted political spear-carriers acting out their White House fantasies in the remote theatre of a New England primary." Mr. Gordon went on to explain the depressing calibre of the candidates by speaking of their subservience to "the vested interests and powerful lobbies that manipulate and shape American policy."

No doubt so. But we in Britain have no reason to be smug on this matter, for in all-round dwarfishness the vast majority of political 'leaders' in this country are more than a match for their counterparts over the Atlantic.

On the front page of the News of the World on February 14th was a picture of a man almost naked but for a judge's wig that he was wearing in an attempt to ridicule the law lords. The man thus photographed was none other than the elected member of parliament for the constituency of Brent (North West London), Mr. Paul Boateng. The report accompanying the photo said:-

"The Honourable Member for Brent bared almost everything at a riotous left-wing party. He had a 2,000-strong audience — including many gays and lesbians — roaring when he pulled back his gown to reveal a brief, black and bulging G-string. Even some of bewigged Boateng's cronies were shocked at his amazing antics during the thrash at London's County Hall. Fellow left-wing MP 'Red' Ken Livingstone — dressed up as Robin Hood — was stunned into silence by his colleague's raunchy rig-out."

None of this should cause us surprise. For Boateng is merely one of several hundred public clowns who have managed to get themselves installed in seats in the 'Mother of Parliaments', along with colleagues so grey and colourless you wouldn't notice them if they came into a room accompanied by a thunder-clap. They are the second, third and fourth-raters that inevitably graduate to public office under our democratic party system. And much the same kind of political circus exists in America, and so it is not extraordinary that, there too, the nation's political bosses should consist of the same medley of harlequins and nonentities.

Considering that under 'democracy' the people's elected representatives are nothing but marionettes dangled on the ends of strings by much more powerful people hidden from public view (as acknowledged in the Daily Mail report), it would be surprising if anyone was allowed ever to get to the top in politics who was endowed with any real intelligence or force of character of the kind needed for true leadership.

It is said that the people get the politicians they deserve, and the same is true of political systems.

Now that the Commons here in Britain has voted for the TV cameras to be allowed within its walls, we can look forward to seeing, as well as hearing, these grotesque wallies perform in the daily parliamentary debates. Let's hope that that spectacle serves to increase public consciousness of the stature (or lack of it) of those whom our votes elevate to the most exalted offices in the land.

Common Market sell-out

Last month we were treated to the familiar spectacle of Mrs. Thatcher stalking, handbag brandished, into the councils of the Common Market to the accompaniment of martial air played by the Tory press — all designed to create the scenario for a 'Churchillian' stand for British interests. In the outcome, the prime minister returned — with what? Boiled down to the nuts and bolts, just another sell-out.

THATCHER (WITH CHIRAC)
After all the huff and puff, she brought home practically nothing from European conference

The Common Agricultural Policy remains intact, although, for appearance's sake, a ceiling has been put on its cost. European farmers will continue to be paid too much. The huge mountains of butter and grain will continue to accumulate. Each British family will continue to pay £550 a year more for its food than it should have to.

The Common Market is just one more area — race, crime and Northern Ireland are others — in which Maggie has been depicted by the media as a doughty crusader with a firm resolve, but in which, in reality, she has shown the fibre of a jellyfish. Just when will the great myth of the 'Iron Lady' be exploded?

Eire keep out!

Even by its own standards, the government's recent handling of the Ulster situation has been pathetic.

It started with a decision that was perfectly correct: the decision not to prosecute those officers of the RUC believed to have carried out a 'shoot-to-kill' policy against known IRA activists. Britain is at war in Ulster, and when you are in a war killing your enemy — strange though it may seem to some people — is the object of the exercise. Although this particular practice is not to be commended in normal circumstances of policing operations, the circumstances in Ulster are not normal, and they therefore call for an entirely different response. may not have been tried and found guilty of acts of terrorism by a court, the fact that they were known by the RUC to be involved, even if only as auxiliaries, in the war of subversion in the province is good enough reason for this magazine to weep no tears over their demise.

When, as was quite predictable, the government of the Irish Republic started expostulating in protest against the decision not to prosecute these RUC officers, the correct response by our own government would have been to tell them to mind their own business. Northern Ireland is Britain's affair and no-one else's. That a foreign government should poke its nose in here is nothing less than intolerable.

But instead, our government was prepared to sit down and talk to the Dublin government about the matter, Mrs. Thatcher taking time in the midst of her Brussels schedule to confer with Irish premier Haughey, a nauseating little upstart if ever there was one.

Worse still, the government was prepared to meet the Dubliners and also discuss with them the decision not to allow the appeal of the Birmingham pub bombers and the recent action of continuing the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism Act — again both matters which have nothing to do with any outside interests, the Irish Republic included.

Now, as a result of these discussions — and no doubt also 'pressure' from other quarters — a new investigation into the 'shoot-to-kill' affair is to be launched.

The whole performance has been lamentable, and it just highlights again the abysmal weakness of this government when it comes to defending the British interest and British independence and nationhood, whether in Ireland or in Europe.

What is behind the Waldheim affair?

We believe there is much more to the current rumpus over Austrian president Kurt Waldheim than meets the eye.

It is absolutely certain that, when Waldheim was made secretary-general of UNO several years ago, there was a thorough vetting of his entire background, including of course his record as an officer in the German Army in World War II. Had there been anything in this record that might have cast doubt on Waldheim's qualification for the UNO post, you can be absolutely sure that it would have been found at that time.

Yet nothing was found to disqualify Waldheim from the top UNO job.

Now we are told that 'new information' has come to light which indicates that, as a German officer in the war, Waldheim knew of certain 'war crimes' but did nothing to stop them, thus casting himself in the role of a passive collaborator in these allged crimes.

The whole business stinks.

Our guess is that sometime between his having vacated his UNO secretary-generalship and his running for the Austrian presidency Waldheim said or did something to put himself on the international Zionist blacklist. The matter may well have been quite small, but sufficient to convince the world's real rulers that Dr. Waldheim would not be the reliable lackey that western heads of state and government are expected to be. He had to be politically destroyed, and the fact that he served in the German forces in the war made this not a difficult task. In view of the vast web of mythology that has been constructed around all German operations in all the theatres of the war, a mythology in which there was nowhere, apparently, where the German presence was not attended by some 'atrocities' or other, it is perfectly easy to link by association with these 'atrocities' practically every person alive who wore the German uniform at the time.

Merely by refusing to carry out orders — for which the penalty inevitably was the firing squad — just about every member of the German forces could be linked with whatever 'war crime', real or imagined, that occurred in the vicinity in which he served.

So, in a sense, every person who served in or with the German forces in those days is a hostage — he can readily be turned into a 'war criminal', even if only a small one, if he does not do exactly as he is told.

At the time this copy goes to press, it is not yet known whether Waldheim will survive as Austrian president or not.

But there is one thing that can be said with certainty. The Waldheim affair has demonstrated, with overwhelming clarity, the power and malignancy of the international Zionist machine of pressure, intimidation and vengeance that is liable to be used against any politician, in any country, who falls out of Zionist favour. It also demonstrates how practically every contemporary government, particularly in the West, is petrified of courting Zionist wrath. The government of Austria, had it had any national self-respect, would have long ago told the world Zionist lobby to refrain from poking its nose in Austria's affairs. But no! Throughout the Waldheim saga, the Austrian government has genuflected with sickening obsequiousness to Zionist commands in the manner in which it has demonstrated almost a collective nervous breakdown over the matter of Waldheim.

We do not find the Austrian president a particularly appealing figure. But we hope very much that he digs his heels in and gets the support of his country in holding on to his post — for that will be a smack in the eye for the international Zionist busybodies and meddlers who think they have a right to tell every nation how it will run its affairs and whom it will choose for what office.

Come to think of it, what on earth are Zionists doing hunting 'war criminals' when there is more than a generous share of such people among the present and recent past leaders of the State of Israel?

What is a masterpiece?

Quite a few men who attained eminence outside the art world were amateur painters themselves and, in view of their international reputations, conferred upon their artistic products considerable curiosity value. Winston Churchill was one, and another, apparently, was Sir Noel Coward.

In The Daily Mail of February 19th there was a report on a sale of Coward's paintings held at Christie's in London, at which pictures changed hands for a total of more than £¾ million. The Mail, in mentioning this, chose to refer to Coward's products as 'masterpieces of art' — and in its headlines at that!

We reproduce here a sample of one of these 'masterpieces' so that our readers may decide for themselves whether it fits such a description. It is of a scene in Jamaica, and it fetched £55,000.

This editor, speaking personally, has seen far better pictures exhibited on the walls of schoolrooms and painted by unsung 12-year-olds.

Along with this 'masterpiece' by Sir Noel, we reprint on this page another painting, which is of the Minorite Church in Vienna. It too was painted by a man who was not a professional but nevertheless later in life made his mark in other fields. His name? Adolf Hitler.

Honestly, which painting is the better?

Clearly, in this day and age, being King of the Poofers is a greater qualification for eminence and acclaim in the world of art than actual merit as an artist — for we have yet to hear the description 'masterpiece' bestowed on any of the works produced by the man whose painting is here exhibited beside that of the writer of Bitter Sweet.

Coward's painting (above) and Hitler's (right): which is superior?

CONSISTENCY IN INCONSISTENCY

In the humbug and contradictions of 'liberalism', says JOHN TYNDALL, there is the relentless logic of destruction

PEREGRINE WORSTHORNE, writing recently in the Sunday Telegraph, put the spotlight on a phenomenon well known to those who trouble themselves to look beneath the surface of mere words and slogans that dominate today's media headlines. In a leader article headed 'The oppressive face of modern liberalism', he said:-

"Free speech, to the liberal, is increasingly a matter of being allowed to say or write things that liberals approve of. Freedom of the press to publish official secrets — that must be permitted, since it is in the public interest. But on no account must the press be free to say or write anything that might upset good race relations, since that would be against the public interest. As a non-liberal editor, I can see the points for curtailments of free speech on both counts. Not so the liberal editor, who has no objection to being muzzled by the courts in the matter of race, and only cries 'Press freedom in danger' when the courts order him to refrain putting national security at risk."

"The same double-standards apply even more blatantly to the liberal's support of democracy and authoritarianism. In fact the greatest breach of all democratic principles perpetrated in this country this century was the series of covert decisions, all taken against the popular will, which resulted in this country becoming a multi-racial society — a transformation more profound and more irreversible than any mere political or industrial revolution. No fearless investigator from the Guardian or the Observer ferreted out the truth of what was going on in respect of this particular conspiracy against the people. If anything, the liberal media allowed itself to become part of the conspiracy, playing down the facts so as not to arouse too much public opposition. To all intents and purposes, the creation of a multi-racial society was a liberal coup d'état and to this day it has never been legitimised by any convincing constitutional process..."

"When Mrs. Thatcher opposes the liberal élites they accuse her of authoritarianism, even when she has got the great mass of public opinion on her side. When the liberal élites were in power and governed autocratically against the grain of public opinion, that apparently constituted no threat to freedom."

While we may quibble with Worsthorne's suggestion that there is a point for curtailment of free speech on race, and while we may doubt the true seriousness of Mrs. Thatcher's 'opposition' to the liberal élites and the implication that those élites are no longer in power, it remains a fact that the broad substance of what Worsthorne says here is correct. To the liberal, people's right to be 'free' to say or do this or that is one to be determined with careful selectivity, and in accordance with whether such exercises of freedom produce results which assist, or hinder, the goals of liberalism. Where the latter is thought to be likely, 'democratic' principles are quickly forgotten and 'democratic' practices conveniently suspended. The liberal-democrat dons the clothes of the most rigid autocrat.

'PERMISSIVE CENSORSHIP'

A similar theme ran through an article in The Spectator of the 21st November, entitled 'Permissive censorship'. The article was written by the now repentant former leftie Paul Johnson, who these days has become a Thatcherite. While much of Mr. Johnson's writings still consist of nonsense, he does nowadays occasionally hit the bullseye. In this piece he said:-

"In recent years it has been fascinating, and also frightening, to watch the developing paradox whereby the era of permissiveness, introduced in the 1960s, has become in the 1980s the era of Permissive Censorship. The old taboos have been turned on their heads, rather as Marx upended Hegel's dialectic. Sections of society who once complained of injustice, like Blacks, homosexuals and militant women, now demand not just equality but privilege, including the right to censor their critics. With the help of their liberal allies, they are getting their way too. There are now large and important areas of public policy where open debate is impossible."

"...I think it can be truthfully said that no newspaper now dares to publish articles which discuss Britain's race problems frankly. Legal censorship by the Race Relations Industry is reinforced by such bodies as the Press Council, the NUJ and other unions, as well of course by Labour-controlled local authorities."

And:-

"Permissive censorship now operates throughout the arts, with varying degrees of severity. When US feminists succeeded, at least for some time, in preventing the New York publication of Kingsley Amis's Stanley and the Women, people said that such things couldn't happen over here. Not quite in the same way, of course. But permissive censorship is being operated all the time by the television duopoly. The suppression of Ian Curteis's Falklands play proves that it is impossible to get into the BBC any dramatic material on this subject, however brilliantly written, which does not present Mrs. Thatcher in an unfavourable light."

This piece of mostly common sense is spoilt in the last two lines by the making of the prime minister the martyr of the liberal censorship process, whereas the real truth is that the purpose of the suppression of the Curteis play on the Falklands War was to exclude anything which might contain a patriotic or nationalist message. However, again the main substance of what the author says is wholly justified. And he goes on, speaking of themes that would stand no chance of getting an airing on TV:-

"Nor would a play which illustrated the role of homosexuals in spreading AIDS, or the cruelty and intolerance often practised by social workers, or the tricks and frauds of a left-wing 'investigative journalist', or the arguments in favour of such permissive hate-subjects as capital punishment or foxhunting. Imagine a play putting, say, the ordinary white South African in a good light. It might be written with the skill of Shakespeare but it would not get a showing on British television."

INCONSISTENCY

The theme, of course, of both these writers' observations is that of inconsistency, the inconsistency between the theory and practice of liberalism, and between liberals' adherence to their professed principles in certain cases and their blatant desertion of those same principles in others. The paradox can of course be explained by a distinction between ends and means. To those adhering to the liberal-leftist world view, illiberal methods are thoroughly justified when they are adopted in pursuit of ultimate liberal objectives — an ethos in which liberals and communists find common ground, as in so much else. It is always necessary to lie, however, about what forms the essential core of the doctrine of liberalism. And the most basic lie is the claim that the liberal goal is a world of 'freedom'; in fact, liberalism's goals, and the goals of its allies on the left, have nothing to do with any such 'freedom'; 'freedom' is simply a convenient mask behind which to obfuscate and confuse. As I have indicated, it is deemed good when it advances liberal aims, while bad when it does not.

But the examples given earlier only touch the surface of the massive catalogue of inconsistencies that exist in the liberal-leftist picture of the contemporary national and world scene. There is so much more that can be found.

Ivor Benson, writing in Behind the News, a penetrating monthly commentary on current affairs which, like Spearhead, has no hope of being sold in bookshops or newsagents, nor quoted in the 'establishment' press, because it is on the liberal-leftist blacklist — had this to say in the February 1988 issue, dealing with the situation in Northern Ireland:-

"An infinitely complex and contradictory picture is presented as Irishmen kill and are killed in Ulster for a nationalist ideal which has been almost wholly deprived of meaning in the Republic of Ireland. While the IRA fight for a piece of territory which they claim for Ireland, in the South a Republican Government has been permitted to surrender a substantial portion of national sovereignty by joining the European Economic Community..."

"The picture is made even harder to read by the wholly disproportionate Irish contribution to English culture, especially in literature. If there is any difference between the Irish and the British capable of evoking a Sinn Fein ('ourselves alone') response, it can only be one of phase, that subtle sense of difference which so distinguishes the English, Scots and Welsh."

And later the writer says:-

"...The paradox that needs to be resolved is that of an inflamed Irish nationalism (what could be more right-wing?) being enthusiastically applauded and encouraged by the most radical revolutionary elements of the left. Here we see in alliance an ideal of particularist national and cultural identity (Sinn Fein) and a revolutionary universalist ideal wholly committed to the extirpation of every form of national and cultural identity and awareness."

Precisely so. All that remains to be added is a comment on how curious it is that such obvious contradictions as those pointed out by Mr. Benson in the Ulster situation are not the subject of much wider comment by writers, journalists and political spokesmen everywhere. Why indeed have not the politicians of the so-called 'right', from Mrs. Thatcher downwards (who one would have thought would be eager to seize upon arguments to expose the absurd suppositions of their opponents), placed emphasis on such inconsistencies? Why does it fall to the odd commentator, like Mr. Worsthorne and Mr. Johnson, in just the occasional article, to point out things which should occupy centre stage in all current political debate?

WORLD OF CONTRADICTION

To the contradictions mentioned by the writers quoted, a list could be added that is almost endless in its scope. I will simply illustrate here a few of particular prominence that come to mind:-

(1) Related not too distantly to the observations made by Mr. Benson about Ireland, there is the claim that the former British Dominions, which comprised the most important kernel of what we used to be pleased to call the Empire, must now be treated as 'foreign' countries, on the grounds that 'inevitably', they have developed their own nationalism and must be regarded as having destinies separate from Britain; parallel with this purported development, there is the claim that nationalism is now 'out of date' and that the world is progressing towards greater political and economic integration, 'interdependence' and 'pooled'

ULSTER
Murder and destruction in the name of Irish Republican 'nationalism' while the policy of the Republic itself is internationalist sovereignty. Why is it right for Britain to become increasingly alienated from her overseas kith and kin, while it is also right for her to become increasingly integrated with the rest of the world, and particularly the countries of the EEC?

(2) And why, in the former Dominions, is a new 'nationalism' being proclaimed while at the same time the governments of those same former Dominions are working with frantic haste to turn their countries into ethnic melting pots, in thorough conformity with the new 'world order' which decrees that nationalism is out of date, and which world order they enthusiastically support? Why, in Australia, for instance, the drive to achieve separation from Britain in the name of 'nationalism' paralleled by an equally intensive drive to bring about integration with Asia, and Asians, in the name of 'international brotherhood'?

(3) In the wake of imperial dismantlement, not just by Britain but also by other former imperial powers, we are told that the former colonies — of Africa, Asia, the West Indies, etc. — have become 'independent'. Why then are they not independent economically? Why do we have to continue supporting them with economic subsidies? Why have we only shed the powers and privileges of empire but not the burdens?

(4) And why are these continual economic subsidies regarded as being necessary and justified, now more than a generation after these countries were relieved of the colonial yoke, if, as is claimed, their peoples are 'equal' to us?

(5) The 'official' explanation of Britain's and America's involvement in World War II is that we had to fight to free the small nations of Europe and to liberate that continent from 'totalitarianism'. Why then have we not gone to war to free small nations from Soviet rule and Soviet totalitarianism?

(6) Today, there is a largely integrated western defensive alliance against the alleged threat of Soviet military power. Yet who collaborated in bringing that very Soviet military power right into the heart of Europe, by support for the Soviets in World War II and complicity in the Yalta Agreement afterwards? And who are today keeping the Soviet economy alive by extensive financial and technological aid, and by the selling off of butter and other food 'mountains' to the Soviets at knock-down prices? Why, the very western nations whom the Soviets are supposed to be 'threatening'!

(7) Why, in Britain, is generous financial support being given by local authorities to ethnic minority groups, supposedly for the preservation of those groups' distinctive ethnic cultures and customs, while it is at the same time being claimed that these groups are 'British' and that it is desirable to integrate them into the host population?

(8) And if, as might be anticipated, the answer given to the foregoing question is that the preservation of separate ethnic cultures is not incompatible with a common nationality and statehood, why is there not a proportionate support being given to the preservation of the ethnic culture of the largest group within the population, the Anglo-Saxon-Celtic majority?

(9) At the time of the Galtieri military government in Argentina some years ago, liberals and leftists everywhere were attacking that government and clamouring for it to be pulled down. Yet the very next moment, when the Falklands War broke out, those same liberals and leftists were to be heard supporting the surrender of the islands to that very military government!

(10) Liberals and leftists the world over are conspicuous in campaigning for 'civil liberties' and the release of 'political prisoners'. Yet not one of them known to us was prepared to campaign for the release of the late Rudolf Hess from prison, even when he was in his nineties (and remember that Hess was never found guilty of any 'war crimes', real or imagined).

These are just ten examples, among many, of total inconsistencies in the official 'party line' approved by leftists and liberals, and for the most part approved also by Conservatives, indeed the whole 'establishment'.

Both Mr. Worsthorne in The Sunday Telegraph and Mr. Johnson in The Spectator have made so bold (at least by Fleet Street standards) as to point out a few particularly glaring examples of inconsistency and contradiction in the current liberal consensus. We must be grateful for these small grains of revelation from the pens of the well-placed and the influential; but, as I have pointed out, the process extends much further, and for the most part implicates those on the right, as well as on the left and centre, of conventional politics and journalism — something which neither gentleman seems prepared to admit. Each also portrays less than an accurate picture of the situation when he depicts Mrs. Thatcher as outside, rather than inside, this liberalistic racket of double-standards.

WHAT IS BEHIND IT ALL?

But the most glaring omission in each case — though not in that of Mr. Benson (whom I know personally and recognise as being prepared to take his argument much further) — is that the matter is laid to rest there. We are left reflecting on liberals' humbug and hypocrisy, and perhaps their stupidity, but we are not invited to enquire what lies behind that evident humbug, hypocrisy and stupidity. The position of liberalism is seen as either intellectually dishonest or intellectually incompetent. But it is not seen as any more than that.

Perhaps I may be permitted to supply the final piece in this bewildering jig-saw puzzle, the piece that Messrs. Worsthorne and Johnson appear to have let fall somewhere under the table or, possibly, preferred to slip into their pockets, thinking that the completed picture would be too shocking to submit to exposure.

This is that, behind the apparent inconsis-

AFRICA

They are our 'equals', yet we have to go on supporting them

ency, there is in fact a thorough consistency. The inconsistency lies only in the tactics; there is complete consistency of strategy. The strategy is simply the destruction of Britain and the white nations of the world — at least those white nations that are genuine nations and which present, in large measure or small, some obstruction to the new world order that is being planned for us by those who today exercise dominant power in national and international affairs.

Everything that contributes to our national destruction is to be enthusiastically supported and relentlessly pursued. Everything that might serve to hold our national fabric together and strengthen it is to be consistently opposed and, at the earliest possible moment, destroyed. In different tactical situations, different, and apparently opposite, weapons are to be employed. In this way there is not illogic, but perfect logic, in opposition to the Official Secrets Act in the name of 'freedom' accompanied by opposition to freedom of debate on the multi-racial society. Freedom from the Act is good because it undermines national security and therefore the national interest; freedom to discuss race frankly, on the other hand, is bad because out of that discussion there might come changes of policy that serve the national interest. The same logic attends the support of the 'nationalist' IRA by the internationalist left, and the murder campaign in Ulster in the name of Irish Republican 'nationalism' while the policy of the Irish Republic itself is internationalist. The consistency of these seeming inconsistencies is that all policies and attitudes are directed towards undermining Britain, by dividing and weakening it. That, dear readers, is the name of the game!

In accordance with the same rules, crusades to protect small nations and save the world from 'totalitarianism' are admirable enterprises when National Socialists or Fascists are the enemies; they are to be avoided, in the name of 'peace', 'disarmament' and 'detente' when Communists are the enemies. Again, there is only a superficial inconsistency; at base, the policy is entirely consistent: National Socialism and Fascism are seen as bulwarks of nationhood and race, and are therefore to be opposed; Communism is antipathetical to nationhood and race and is therefore, despite overt differences, an ally. As for 'totalitarianism', that is just a word — there to be made to mean whatever liberals and leftists want it to mean. So the practice of double-standards and contradictions continues. Black is white and white is black. Wrong is right and right is wrong. Truth is falsehood and falsehood is truth. All these changes can occur, and entirely in accordance with what meets the requirements of any given moment and situation in the drive by our enemies to destroy us. The surprise is only that so few of us seem to recognise the name of the game and to refuse to accept the alternating labels and slogans as representing reality.

THE POWER STRUGGLE

And as for 'liberalism', 'socialism', 'conservatism' and now 'social democracy', these are just words, phrases, mere mirages erected to present facades of 'principles' behind which is operating a ruthless and determined bid to change the traditional centre and source of power, transferring power from the formerly sovereign nation-states to a newly formed international state, from the once dominant white races to a new international race.

Such ideological nameplates are of course convenient to baffle, to bemuse and ultimately to corral herds of populations hopelessly lacking in any understanding of what is really going on, and with the object of directing their political ardour, such as it is, into shadow-boxing contests of faction and party which, in the situation of today, have almost no bearing whatever on the crucial struggle for power that is taking place under their very noses, and which their side is losing with the passing of every round.

So, and I repeat, it is not illogical, but entirely logical, that 'liberals' should be heard daily mouthing empty slogans relating to some question of principle and then the very next day acting in accordance with an entirely opposite and contrary principle — for these 'liberals' are the dumb beasts which perform the menial work of the revolution that is taking place. Theirs is not to reason why; theirs is to do as they are told!

There are of course some among these species who are aware of the inconsistencies of their own utterances and behaviour — they would have to be unbelievably stupid if they were not! But the practice is rationalised in terms of the necessities of politics — which to them mean no more than the necessity of the victory of their own party or faction and their consequent enjoyment, they hope, of the trappings of office and the illusion of 'power'. These are the NCOs of the world revolution, who are available in their thousands and whose mental landscape is such that they see and understand just that extent of the battlefield that NCOs are expected to see and understand, an extent sufficient for them to carry out their allotted tasks but no more than that. The practice of living a continual lie, of standing for one principle one moment and another principle the next, is a perfectly acceptable one, to be embraced without qualm if it pleases the high command and results in a rise in pay, and perhaps an extra stripe! After all, what is warfare but the practice of deception to fool the man in the opposite trench and gain 100 yards of ground? In this way, the political front-line soldier, like the Allied soldier in 1939-45, fights his own tiny war in his own minute sector of the war zone, having not the remotest conception of the overall grand strategy that is being pursued, least of all of the kind of world that will emerge when the conflict is over.

In this way must we see the contradictions and paradoxes of liberalism in action. They are all perfectly logical moves towards a single and unaltering aim. Once the aim is understood, the moves are no longer a matter of mystery. And far from pointing in different directions, they all point in the same direction: our national ruin and our liquidation as a race.

THE ELEMENTS OF OPTIMISM

PETER FOWLER sees in the coming nemesis of the old system the great opportunity for nationalism

ADDRESSING the House of Commons in 1930, a politician of singular insight visualised as the gravest danger to Britain, not a sudden calamity, but a "long, slow, crumbling through the years...a gradual paralysis, beneath which all the vigour and energy of this country will succumb."

In 1988 we have reached a point of decadence more harrowing and more wholesale than at any time of our history, and the process of degeneration has indeed been an insidiously deliberate one. Decline has paced crepe-soled under the patronage of one feeble government after another, and the British people have been lulled and demoralised by the artful rhythm of it.

That is why the message of Nationalism has so far been heeded by only a very few. Some crisis of magnitude might at least have forced a general recognition of the need for the Nationalist alternative; against a stealthy erosion of the nation's fibre no such thrust has been possible.

Whilst it broke this miserable continuity, a disastrous war nearly half a century ago simply confirmed our humiliations. A brief revival of patriotism and racial character was quickly nullified by loss of Empire and the lethargy of peace. The implacable tempo of decomposition was resumed — and to even more malicious purpose.

Here then is a grim synopsis of relentless mischiefs, and were it the end of the matter there would be justification for the "spirit of pessimism and defeatism" John Tyndall denounced in the course of his new year's message. Such is not the case, however, because our dragged-out descent into the gutter has yet to reach a culmination. This is an inescapable fact, and one from which we can draw some encouraging conclusions.

To propose that the climax to decades of creeping anarchy will occur in the near future would be absurd; but it is not wholly unreasonable to suggest that it might happen a trifle sooner than we expect. So, too, there are logical grounds for conceiving the form it will take. Evidence in support of the first assumption will emerge as we proceed. Suffice it for the moment to say that the 'crumbling' is beginning to gain in momentum, and the 'gradual paralysis' shows signs of becoming an eventual paroxysm. As for the actual outcome of events, everything indicates that, not only will a cankered social structure disintegrate from its own rottenness, but there is every likelihood that the liberal-democratic system — by which that structure has been created and maintained — will collapse along with it. Political system and social system, so inextricably coupled, would appear to be destined to a common and simultaneous fate, all of their beneficiaries and parasites consigned to oblivion with the entire foul caboodle: dungheap and flies together!

Of course, such an assertion will be open to dispute from particular quarters. It can be argued that Nationalists have prophesied the death of liberal-democracy for some considerable time past, and that the old order nevertheless prevails. It may also be protested, not at first glance without substance, that such predictions are no more plausible now than they were ten, thirty or fifty years ago.

In response, let us examine the contemporary scene more closely.

POLLUTED SUB-CULTURE

One has no need to ransack for illustrations of the moral, spiritual and material afflictions that in Britain make up the accepted pattern of existence.

We are here dealing with a social landscape that is wretchedly dismal, and within which the tenor of life is sordid, trivialised and in essence deranged; but, being mere symptoms of a specific political disease, these things can be referred to without entering into any great detail. Significantly, however, they reflect what the present Tory administration would have us regard as 'radical revolution'.

Dissolution would be more of an appropriate term to use.

Recent generations have been raised according to the ugly ethic: "Do as you please," and in the stampede for the libertarian trough a complete way of life has been trampled underfoot. It is an age of closed minds and clenched fists. We navigate a polluted sub-culture of distorted art, monstrous architecture and dissonant music, repelled by gross impoverishment yet forever tripping over the abundant litter of consumerism. Our inner cities are plague-spots of squalor, graffiti and garbage. Whole working class communities have been destroyed, along with their habitual ways of living together, and their human components scattered into high-rise tower blocks and hideously identical estates. The ideal of the family as a fundamental unit of civilised society has been undermined by a sick 'humanitarian' tolerance of illegitimacy, abortion, sterilisation, easy divorce and moral deviancy. The notion of duty has been replaced by the spurious concept of individual 'rights' — an abstraction made popularly admissible by giving innocent names to depravity (sodomy deodorised as 'gaity', bastardy filtered into 'single parenthood'). Educational establishments have become cancer cells of subversion. Many of the young, warped by trendy misteaching and wallowing in alien-imported life styles, are slovenly in appearance, uncouth in conduct and vacuous in mentality.

A sizeable proportion of the elderly and unemployed eke out their days on a pittance. The 'Yuppies', energised by a 'new spirit of enterprise', glut themselves contentedly on 'monetarism' like maggots on a carcas.

Public thoroughfares have been surrendered to the mugger, the rapist and the mob. Violence is a commonplace, and the favoured targets for beating and butchery are the most helpless elements available — children and the infirm.

The prisons, transformed from penal institutions into residential hotels, are overflowing.

Copiously mingled with drug-addiction, alcoholism, child abuse, vandalism, promiscuity and sexual infections, these are the more familiar features of the liberal-democratic 'free society'.

Its devotees, on one account at least, can afford to swagger: the 'equality of man', in all other spheres of life so patently a fiction, is fully vindicated in the egalitarianism of corruption.

ECONOMIC REALITIES

The vistas spread before us on the economic front are scarcely more inviting.

There is a constant output of government propaganda on the theme of 'Booming Britain', yet the realities behind this spiling portend a situation nearer to bankruptcy. It is an awkward quirk of human nature that people are willing to believe complex lies but refuse to recognise simple truths. The facts of this issue are perfectly uncomplicated, but it still remains for them to be widely grasped.

We have managed to survive one major extremity in the past, the slump of the 1930s, albeit at a cost of massive unemployment and broadcast distress; and we have contrived, through a combination of expediency and pure luck, to avoid another since the end of World War II. But neither artifice nor blind chance is going to preserve us indefinitely, and the ultimate crash is inevitably going to be far worse than anything we have experienced hitherto.

It is going to be worse than the crisis of the 1930s for a number of very sound reasons. Firstly, the war and its aftermath stripped us of an Empire possessed of enormous potential and which, intelligently utilised, would have provided a buttress against all possible disasters. At the same time, the war bloated the National Debt to an astronomical extent, and compelled government to sell off many of its financial assets.

Government then proceeded to do precisely the opposite to what it ought to have done: it adopted the laissez-faire economic policies that had enthralled this country for a century and a half. So once again, though reduced to the status almost of a banana republic, Britain became the pawn of a system controlled by international financial interests; and once again, for the benefit of cosmopolitan stock market speculators, we were shackled to the treacherous fallacy that we must 'export or die'.

From then until now we have been rendered utterly dependent upon our capacity to secure foreign markets for our goods, regardless of the ruinous effects upon our home industries, accruing from which millions of decent workers have been pitched onto the scrapheap.

Nor will our hazards cease there.

We are already producing for diminishing overseas markets; but when America, the most powerful economy in the world, is forced to import less and boost exports, our foreign outlets will shrink even more dramatically. In plain words, we cannot hope to compete successfully in a scramble for world markets that will be unavoidable, and we shall assuredly go to the wall.

Despite all the experiences of the past, and in flat contradiction of all logic, the old-gang politicians doggedly persist in applying 19th century ideas to 20th century exigencies. And they do so because they are the lackeys of the international bankers.

They are in an invidious predicament. With vested interests goading them from behind, and certain nemesis awaiting them ahead, they have no choice but to bluff and blunder to the very end.

MULTI-RACIALISM

There is no satisfaction in adding to so formidable an itinerary of troubles, but an additional reason for disquiet has to be mentioned.

Time was, within living memory, when the United Kingdom comprised an overwhelmingly homogeneous population. It was then a straightforward business to tackle political, social and economic questions without fears of upsetting our national equilibrium. Such is no longer the case. We now have to contend with what is called the 'multi-racial society', and wrapped up in this are potentialities for discord and antipathies we could well do without.

Many issues are involved in this direction, some of them hinging on our very existence as a unique and distinct Anglo-Saxon-Celtic community; but it is necessary here only to allude to factors relevant to the present article.

When immigration got underway in earnest, Britain was already burdened with over-population, rising unemployment and a major housing shortage. Even at that early stage, however, the dimensions and implications of what was taking place aroused blunt and sensible reactions in some quarters, as the following quotation from The Daily Telegraph, dated March 11th 1965, will illustrate:-

"It has been said repeatedly that our transport, hospitals and other services would break down without immigrant labour. But the cost to central and local government of providing the extra housing, schooling, health services, welfare and other facilities necessitated by the influx must be set against the advantages derived. When these data are assembled, it may transpire that the nation's economic interests might have been better served by the introduction of labour-saving devices accompanied by higher wages in the branches which have become the main users, or in some cases importers, of immigrant labour."

SYMPTOMS OF DISINTEGRATION

Since those words saw the light of day, the immigrant settlement has been hugely augmented, and it is being continually swollen by fresh arrivals. Moreover, the ethnic birthrate far exceeds the reproductive level of indigenous Britons.

It requires little imagination (statistics are, for obvious reasons, unavailable) to grasp that the claims of these people on our national resources must be correspondingly intensified, and not only in terms of the facilities listed in the Telegraph editorial, but nowadays also with regard to the upkeep of a vast, bureaucratic Race Relations Industry.

Contrawise, were these costly and averse impositions to be cancelled out by means of organised repatriation (neither as impractical nor as uncivilised as multi-racialists would have us accept), the resultant benefits to this country and its inhabitants should be equally apparent.

THE POLITICAL CONTRACEPTIVE

Now what can our liberal-democratic representatives offer in response to all this? In pursuit of national revival, what can we expect from the existing system — that political contraceptive which prohibits all creative thought and stems the flow of all constructive action?

The answer is: absolutely nothing!

The whole tainted structure lies snugly in the pocket of High Finance, and the politicians who operate within it are merely the employees of that bankers' conspiracy. By these retainers Britain has been treasoned for over 70 years. All their rhetoric, all their enactments, all the concocting of programmes and cobbling of policies are reducible to the savage wasteland we now occupy.

The betrayal of the First World War generation: the homes fit for heroes that never materialised, the dole queues, the Means Test, the 'war against Fascism' that stripped us of greatness, filched our liberties and despoiled our birthright — these are the crimes of the system itself. It is an antiquated, impotent system, completely irrelevant to the modern age, a system made to measure for the charlatan, the careerist and the gullible 'visionary'. There is no place in it for the patriot, whom it crucifies without mercy. The perfect collaborator, however, knows which side his political bread is buttered, and his compliance is neatly summed up in the words of Stanley Baldwin: "I would rather be an opportunist and float than go to the bottom with my principles round my neck."

Over the entrance to this imposing but bogus edifice is inscribed: "Government of the people, by the people and for the people." But the Money Power owns it, and parliament is merely the foyer of the counting house.

CHARACTERS AND CREEDS

For those aim is the eradication of the Anglo-Saxon-Celtic race, no instrument

ROTTING SLUMS

Half a century after the brave promise of 'homes fit for heroes', these are the conditions in which millions of British people still live could better suit their purpose; and never was there a more plentiful supply of characters and creeds to make it function.

Pre-eminent, of course, is Mrs. Thatcher. For eight years, the 'Iron Lady' has supervised the systematic gutting and demoralisation of the British people, lending her maternal support to both race-mixing and the permissive society. Between times, she has summoned bland hypocrisy to lecture us on 'Victorian values'. But when she extols such things she does not mean the instincts of pride, national and personal, which made Britain the most industrious, productive and expansive country in the world. What she invokes are the ideal of thrift propounded by the well-heeled to the destitute, and the virtue of touching the forelock to one's betters. Her conception of the 'new Britain' is simply a rehash of the worst features of the old: a fat upper crust, a contented middle class, and beneath these a cheerless underworld of sweat-shops, shanties and mass vulgarity. All her visions are weaved in terms, not of the Reform Bill, but of the Poor Law. She is in fact busily recreating in the 1980s the kind of divided nation Disraeli castigated in the 1840s.

In 'opposition' to Thatcherism — though on all treasonable fundamentals in solid accord — are the Labour Party, the Social Democratic Party and the recently spawned Social and Liberal Democratic Party.

The Labour Party was once likened, in crisis, to the Salvation Army taking to its heels on the day of Judgement. Should a similar situation occur today, it is doubtful whether our Socialist crusaders could muster even a stumble. They are too well-fed and — the 'Hard Left' once again jostling for control — too saddled with internal power struggles. It is difficult to accept this uninspiring collection of renegades as a serious political factor. The working class it purports to represent is, in the old sense, veritably non-existent, and it would certainly be impossible to find anyone remotely akin to a proletarian in the party's upper echelons.

Leader Neil Kinnock is an intellectual eunuch of some note — a word-producer whose verbal images are conceived without thought, and therefore he fits comfortably enough into the House of Commons. The less said of his lieutenants the better.

The remaining fringe parties merit even less respect.

Trendy Liberals, ideological neurotics and a motley of deserters from the Labour ranks, they are small fish with big ambitions — pilchards posturing as sharks.

CONCLUSION

These then are the options which present themselves to the British people as we draw ever closer to the collapse of the old-gang system. Are they not, in themselves, living prefigurations of that collapse? All of them, according to their fashion, are contributing to the dismantling of this country; all of them are subscribing to the follies and criminalities designed to abrogate two thousand years of history. And in that context alone we are witnessing liberal-democracy co-operating gutlessly in its own destruction.

But in all this we should recognise the elements of optimism that are everywhere manifesting themselves, the signs that the future is with the nationalist cause. And we should draw the correct conclusions from the fact that these symptoms are appearing, not in the system in its heyday, but at the moment when it is clearly approaching its dotage. The Money Power can utilise the system, but it cannot indefinitely sustain it. And the system is cracking at the seams, increasingly taxed by its own misdemeanours. The fact may not yet be apparent to the public, but all the omens should be perceptible to the politically conscious.

Poverty is increasing. Violent crime is increasing. Industrial unrest has re-emerged. Government tightens the screws on that section of the population by whom it has long since been despised and distrusted. The alternative parties are feeble and disordered.

In a very real sense, the system is indeed performing a great deal of our work for us.

But this does not imply that we can stand confidently at ease to await the outcome. Now is the time to redouble our efforts, the time to present our alternative to the people with energy and persistence. Let us rake steadily through our communities, drawing to our ranks those men and women of calibre we shall need for the coming struggle. The days of anarchy and the instalment plan are over. Let us prepare for the day of reckoning.

THE BORROWED LANDS

GEORGE POMFRET looks at some traditional overseas spheres of British influence to which we should pay more attention

IN ITS POLICY STATEMENT 'A New Way Forward', the British National Party states that it is "opposed to the stationing of any foreign forces or weapons systems on British soil." This is a policy objective with which any patriot would agree. But when one thinks of foreign forces on British soil one usually imagines places like Holy Loch or Greenham Common. There are, however, other foreign installations planted on British soil: in Bermuda, the St. Helena Dependencies and the British Indian Ocean Territory.

The Foreign and Colonial Office apologetically refers to these lands as 'dependencies'. They are of course colonies. They are not, as it is fashionable to portray them, liabilities: 'remnants of empire'. As the Falklands War showed, these forgotten outposts can be of great strategic value; and their importance could increase even more as we move toward the turn of the century, when they might become integral parts of a revitalised, healthy, British maritime empire (empire — another unfashionable word!). It would not do, therefore, to have any doubts as to their political status. And the existence of foreign installations on them, especially if those installations belong to a government whose motives may be suspect, is to be avoided at all costs.

BERMUDA

For instance, during the last 20 years, on Bermuda, there have been four occasions when civil unrest has required at least some military presence. So there is always the possibility of a 'popular' rebellion breaking out.

The Bermudas are a beautiful group of islands in the Western Atlantic, 700 miles south east of New York City. Their principal industries are tourism and, regrettably, international finance. A population of 55,000 (40 per-cent of whom are white) is crowded onto only 21 square miles of land, 11 per-cent of

ASCENSION ISLAND

This island was a vital staging post for the recovery of the Falklands by Britain's task force. Above: a session of weapons training in preparation for the assault on the Falklands. Below: tanker aircraft, used for refuelling of Britain's Vulcans and Harriers, line up at Wideawake airfield on the island which is set aside for American use.

American installations include a naval air station at Kinderly Field, and a NASA tracking station. The US Coast Guard also use Bermuda, where it has performed superbly in its search and rescue role. There are 6,000 military personnel, along with 2,800 dependents, on the island. They are a legacy of Churchill's (sober?) judgement, in 1940, as to the utility of 50 World War I-vintage destroyers. The lease on the facilities, by the way, was for 99 years.

Isolated though it seems, Bermuda would play an important part in any NATO-Warsaw Pact war. One American source referred to it as a 'fall-back' base. Interpreted, this means that P3 Orion maritime reconnaissance aircraft would use the island as a base from which to conduct anti-submarine operations and patrols of the southern convoy route to Europe. Upon closer examination, however, there seems to be a flaw in this optimistic scenario.

At the start of any war, the Soviets would probably do the same thing to Keflavik in Iceland, and also to the Azores: hit them with a pre-emptive missile strike. This could take the form of a submarine-launched ballistic missile, submarine-launched cruise missiles or cruise missiles launched from a 'passing' merchant ship. Should the missile(s) be nuclear-tipped — well, Bermuda is a very small place. And if Great Britain had not been at first involved in the original quarrel — what then?

As well as having an airfield, Bermuda also has a good harbour. It has, therefore, the attributes to serve as a western bastion for British interests. And, in conjunction with a militarily developed Gibraltar, it could provide flank security for the lines of communication running north-south: from Great Britain to the St. Helena Dependencies.

ASCENSION ISLAND

Located in mid-ocean near what geographers cheerfully call the 'Atlantic Narrows' (that 'short' stretch of water between the bulges of South America and Africa), the northernmost of these dependencies, Ascension Island, is a bleak place of volcanic origin. Original British facilities on its 34 square miles included a BBC relay station and a civil satellite communications centre. In the wake of the Falklands War, a Royal Navy helicopter flight and an RAF tanker flight are now based there. They are stationed at the American airfield.

I was living in the United States at the outbreak of the war, and I, like many people, knew very little, if anything, about this place. But I do distinctly remember a news commentator saying that the United States was going to allow Great Britain the use of its facilities there, i.e. Wideawake Field and the communications relays. In my ignorance, I immediately assumed that the United States was somehow responsible for this outpost and was making a magnanimous gesture. Looking at the map later, however, I was startled to find a little (U.K.) next to this dot in the ocean. This is a good example of how quickly the question of sovereignty can become a muddled issue in men's minds.

Suppose, for instance, that the United States had decided to side with Argentina. Another Suez?

The value of the island during the Falklands War as a British military staging area is well known; but its worth could be enhanced even further under a nationalist government. Such a course was hinted at by Wulstan Tedder in his excellent article in the August 1987 Spearhead entitled 'The inner meaning of nationalism'. In the article, Mr. Tedder listed three essential elements that are requisite components of any national renaissance. The last of these was the need to establish a long-term external goal. A policy of Far South exploration and development would fit this admirably. And in this case little Ascension Island could become a stepping stone of great geopolitical importance.

ANTARCTICA

The revised Shackleton Report noted the extensive resource potential around the Falklands and in the Southern Ocean: hydrocarbons on the continental shelf off the Falklands, near South Georgia, and around the British Antarctic Territory's Palmer Peninsula; krill harvesting and salmon ranching in the deeps. The Falklands themselves could serve as a secure forward base and staging area for teams operating in these locations, as well as for the exploration and extraction of the potentially staggering mineral resources of the Antarctic Continent. And secure it will have to be too, because the enormous British Antarctic Territory is jointly coveted by late-arriving claim jumpers Argentina and Chile.

As the Antarctic Treaty, which forbids militarisation and economic development, is scheduled for review in 1991, and as competition for world resources becomes keener and keener, the sooner Britain firmly establishes her indisputable sovereignty in this part of the world the better.

Also in the south, but an already developed mineral treasure house, is South Africa. Ascension should also play a role in keeping communications and trade routes open with the Republic. A friendly South Africa would be a great asset because the tanker lanes from the Persian Gulf, as well as the eastern parts of the Commonwealth, lie around the Cape of Good Hope.

REPATRIATION PRECEDENT

The British Indian Ocean Territory was created in 1965. The next year, the British government, which was stumbling over itself in its haste to withdraw East of Suez, leased for 50 years a barren atoll in the Chagos Archipelago to the United States. The price was a £5 million discount on the British Polaris systems — and one other small item: the British government agreed to undertake the forced removal of 2,000 people from the islands. Half of these people were migrant labourers; but the other half were native to the islands. The natives were settled in Mauritius and, after a disgracefully long interval, given £1,500 per family by the British government. The natives, of course, then demanded more. The government agreed, but only if the natives would forever renounce their claims to the islands and pledge never to return there. Well, the story goes on from here, but, whatever happens, all nationalists in Britain owe this government a debt of gratitude for this precedent-setting example of forced repatriation and humane removal.

DIEGO GARCIA

The atoll of Diego Garcia is located 1,100 miles south of India. It is U-shaped, 36 miles in length, but never more than a quarter of a mile wide. The United States constructed a 12,000ft runway on it that can take anything that flies, and a harbour that can accommodate the largest aircraft carrier and nuclear submarines. The island also houses a large fuel farm and communications facilities. There are only a handful of Royal Navy personnel on Diego, but American servicemen are there in the thousands.

With the current British government seemingly doing all it can to squander any and all benefits that can be derived from the North Sea resources, surely a substantial British presence in this region of the world — especially with an eye to the Persian Gulf — is to be encouraged. One wonders why the United States, with its uncharitable Persian Gulf policy, was given the island in the first place. Certainly not so that it could look after 'Western' (including, presumably, British) interests! Not when successive American governments have a track record of hastily seeing the harassed Lion on its way from this part of the world, as well as from every other.

No, the lagoon should be the home of a British task force centred around medium-sized carriers which are capable of force-projection missions. Nimrods should be ranging from the airfield, carrying out maritime patrols and AWACS duties, while the Army and Royal Marines should be represented by an out-of-area mobile force.

THE COST

"But the costs!" "Limited resources..." "Impossible!" Negative thinking in Great Britain today — especially in foreign and defence matters — has reached the status of a growth industry. Everyone seems to be searching for reasons why things cannot be done. Weakness — real or imagined — is highlighted, and even gloated over. One hears about the mythical salami getting sliced thinner and thinner.

However, every nation in history has had strategic weaknesses. And every nation in history has had to live with limited resources. But the resources are there — if one really looks for them and then makes the best use of them (Resources, of course, are both material and human, i.e. racial. Ancient history reminds us of what a handful of impoverished Greeks managed to accomplish, while what

The article here is a reprint from 'The Age' newspaper, printed in Melbourne, Australia, and sent to us by a reader there. As the paper could not possibly called 'anti-semitic' — it would not remain in business for five minutes if it was — the contents of the article are of great interest.

Of course, the article tells our readers little that they do not already know. Nevertheless, it is good to receive confirmation of our own analysis from one of the organs of the 'establishment'!

As the article makes abundantly clear, the United States has no foreign policy to call its own — at least in respect of middle-eastern affairs. It shows that behind the facade of a 'democratically' elected president and congress, America is firmly under the Zionist Jewish heel. British politicians who look to the US as world leader, please take note!

UNCLE SAM'S BOSS

US Jewish lobby ensures Israel has open cheque

By TIM COLEBATCH
Washington,

If one were to draw a map of the world as seen by an American congressman, it would be dominated by a large central shape (his electorate) within an even larger mass (the United States). Beyond that, on the fringes of the world, lie foreigners, a mainly irrelevant lot — and Israel.

Surveys of public opinion show that Canada and Australia are the two countries the average American identifies with most. To his legislators, however, such countries are at best friends; Israel is family.

It is not a view of the world that perhaps came naturally to America's predominantly WASP congressmen, but they have learnt to adopt it because it is the world-view of America's most influential political constituency: its 5.5 million Jews.

Numerically few, their lobby none the less wields immense clout because it is wealthy, educated, well-positioned and articulate — and willing to use its money and skills at election time to ensure that America has a Congress and President who are unwaveringly loyal to Israel.

Politicians who distinguish America's interests from Israel's are openly and unashamedly targeted for defeat. Take Senator Charles Percy. As chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee from 1981 to 1984, he argued that the Palestinian question could not be settled without negotiating with PLO chairman Yasser Arafat.

When Senator Percy faced reelection in 1984, the main Jewish lobby group, the American Israel Political Action Committee, decided he had to go. One Jewish millionaire from distant California single-handedly spent $3 million on billboards and commercials urging Illinois voters to "dump Percy", while AIPAC and other groups denounced him as "anti-Israel".

Senator Percy lost, narrowly. As AIPAC's director, Thomas Dine, put it: "All the Jews in America, from coast to coast, gathered to oust Percy. And American politicians — those who hold public positions now, and those who aspire — got the message."

In recent days, the long stalemate on the future of the Palestinians has been challenged unexpectedly — by rioting in Gaza, televised shootings and beatings of Palestinians by the Israeli Army, and a storm of condemnation by many of Israel's friends. Yet those who dare to hope that this might lead to peace should first consider the realities of political life in America — whose leadership is indispensable for a settlement.

The reality is in the Middle East, the US is a land half free. No President can strike out on a peace path unless he has the Israeli Government with him. And no President can threaten the Israeli Government with serious penalties — the cutoff of aid, for instance — to pressure it to come along. Congress would not allow it.

Politicians who distinguish America's interests from Israel's are openly and unashamedly targeted for defeat.

Thanks to Congress, Israel lives on a virtual blank cheque from the US. Although one of the world's 30 richest countries, it receives by far the largest flow of foreign aid per capita of any country in the world: $5 billion, or $1500 a year for every Israeli man, woman and child — and all from the US.

(By comparison, the US gives India about $300 million a year, or 25 cents for every Indian. Israel receives roughly 20 per cent of all US aid, equivalent to a tax of $75 a year on every American family.)

It is no accident that 12 of the 13 candidates running to succeed Mr Reagan as President have virtually identical policies on the Palestinian issue. (The exception is Jesse Jackson). In contrast to the often lively debate within Israel, the Israeli lobby in the US allows only one basic policy, and to deviate from it would be political suicide.

Its formula is that the US must continue its unstinting support for Israel, refuse to talk to the PLO unless it first recognises Israel, and try to revive the Camp David process by negotiating the future of the occupied territories with Jordan, Egypt and Israel.

Of course, there are many American politicians whose support for Israel is spontaneous and genuine. President Reagan is a prime example. Analysts in Washington believe one reason why the US has been so inactive in trying to drag Israel to the conference table is that Mr Reagan's sympathies are all with the Likud view.

Yet the shootings and beatings have provoked a new attempt. For one thing, they have shaken the consciences of many American Jews, and opened up a bit more room for debate. Leaders of some Jewish groups (though not AIPAC) have condemned the army's tactics as against the spirit of Judaism. The former editor of the 'New York Times', Abe Rosenthal, and others have called for the Defence Minister, Mr Rabin, to resign.

The administration, mildly, has joined the criticism. The Secretary of State, Mr Shultz, is again pressing Israel's Prime Minister, Mr Yitzhak Shamir, to agree to an international conference on the future of the territories it has occupied since 1967. On Wednesday, Mr Shultz met in Washington with two leading Palestinians and Arafat supporters, newspaper editor Hanna Siniora and lawyer Fayez Abu Rahme, having earlier insisted that Israeli authorities lift a travel ban on them.

The White House has also backed at least parts of the peace plan brought to Washington this week by President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt. Welcoming him yesterday, Mr Reagan declared: "The danger of allowing the Palestinian problem to fester is evident, and reinforces the urgency of moving towards negotiations. Hard work, creativity, and a willingness to take practical, not merely rhetorical, steps are needed."

No one in Washington is expecting that to happen, however, unless Labor wins a clear mandate for negotiations in the Israeli elections due later this year. The US may sign Israel's cheques, but in this relationship it is the tail that wags the dog.

NOEL A. HUNT looks at another case where 'race relations' have ridden roughshod over scientific fact

Let her (truth) and falsehood grapple! Who ever knew truth put to the worse in free and open encounter?

John Milton: AREOPAGATICA

THE LIBERAL CONSENSUS, which behind the scenes rules all British political parties, has won yet another battle, as it always seems to do.

We learn from a press report that a Councillor and Mayoress from the Vale of Glamorgan has been compelled to resign her council seat and her position as Mayoress because her fellow Conservative councillors objected to remarks about Africans that she had made.

Her offence appears to have been that she told fifth-form pupils at a school that: "tests have proved that the brains of Blacks are smaller than those of Whites." She is reported to have added that: "This could explain why some African states are not in complete control of their affairs."

These remarks apparently so infuriated her fellow Conservative councillors, who must have been an unusually abject lot even by British Tory standards, that they voted that she should resign. She accordingly did resign. As usual, there was no attempt whatever to disprove the offending statement, no weighing of evidence or even the suggestion that there is any such evidence — still less open and objective discussion of the remarks. Egalitarians very much dislike such truths, which they brand as 'controversial', 'insensitive', 'offensive' and 'racist'. There is never any attempt at rational argument or open debate, simply personal abuse of anyone bold enough to challenge the received view of this and other matters. No-one seems to have asked: "Was the Mayoress right or wrong in her facts? Yet surely this is the first question that should have been asked. Had it been asked, and had the Mayoress been given the chance to answer it properly, she could have proved her point with no trouble, as I shall explain.

'DEMOCRATIC' TABOOS

We British are supposed to pride ourselves on our rights of free speech. Yet this boasted freedom of speech has strictly prescribed limits, as this incident shows. Differences in brain structure and thinking capacities between races, and in the types of civilisations to which these give rise, may not even be hinted at, still less openly debated. Not a word may be said against the multi-racial state in Britain, nor may anyone have a public platform from which to oppose the influx of unassimilable aliens into Britain. Nor may one even hint that the 'holocaust' story is a mere myth, in spite of the formidable body of historical opinion that can now be adduced to support this view. To quote Orwell: "Anyone who challenges the prevailing orthodoxy finds himself silenced with surprising effectiveness."

Attempts at public discussion of any of these vitally important topics are either blandly ignored, smothered by an hysterical chorus of personal abuse or treated with amused or supercilious amazement, as if only

DIFFERENT TRADITION

Attempts to impose European-type political systems on Black African countries have failed hopelessly, resulting in the chaos that we now see in Africa. The armed gang, of the type seen below, is the typical method of rule in Africa, while the summary execution, as seen on the right, is the typical method of 'persuasion' a moron could hold such views.

Mrs. Evelyn Lloyd, the Mayoress to whom I have referred, seems to have resigned needlessly. The findings of scientific enquiries decisively report every word attributed to her. For example, according to Dr. Henry E. Garrett, PhD, "the Negro brain, on the average, is some 100 c.cm smaller in volume, correspondingly lighter in weight and less fissured than that of the White (although the overlap is 20-25 per-cent)..." Further evidence from Dr. Garrett is excluded here because it would place the writer and editor under risk of prosecution for being too explicit on matters of racial differences! This despite the fact that Dr. Garrett is a man of world stature in the field of anthropology.

Another relevant statement is that of H.B. Isherwood in his book Racial Contours: "...the average size of the brain of the present Khoisanoid Bushman is 1,300cc, that of the Negro 1,400cc, as compared with 1,500cc of modern European Caucasoid man."

If yet further proof of the difference in average brain weights between Black and White is needed, consider this extract from a paper printed in the British Medical Journal of March 1932: "The average cranial capacity of the European is 1,400cc, while that of the East African is only 1,310cc. The average weight of the brains is set out in the following table:-

Caucasoid (white)	1,380 grams
East African	1,280 grams
Negroid	1,240 grams
Australoid	1,140 grams"

Contd. overleaf

PUSSYFOOT WINS AGAIN!

The paper from which this extract is taken was written by Dr. James H. Sequiera. This extract was led in evidence in the famous American case of Brown v. the Topeka Education Board. This case was brought by the National Association for the Advancement of Coloured People, and it succeeded — against the weight of the evidence — in having the excellent American system of 'separate but equal' schools declared unconstitutional. The damage done to the American educational system by this iniquitous decision can only be likened to the damage done to the British system by the introduction of comprehensive schools.

Reverting to Dr. Sequiera's paper, when the extract quoted above was introduced into evidence, the NAACP counsel did not dispute the facts quoted, nor did he cross-examine the witness. In other words, he as good as conceded the truth of what Dr. Sequiera had to say.

Many other quotations could be adduced, all from weighty authorities and all based on factual research under strict scientific discipline, and to prove that on the average Blacks do in fact have smaller brains than Whites — though it is fair to point out the 20-25 per-cent overlap referred to.

Perhaps Councillor Lloyd should withdraw her resignation, for her statement was perfectly accurate, however displeasing it may have been to her abject fellow councillors.

It is true that expert opinion today seems to attach almost as much importance to the number of fissures and sulci in the brain as to its weight, and to hold that differences in thinking capacities are as much influenced by these fissures as by weight. None the less, the Mayoress was correct when she said that on the average Blacks have smaller brains than Caucasoids.

GANGSTERS

According to the report, the Mayoress came to the conclusion that this difference in brain sizes was the reason why "some African states are not in full control of their affairs." This was a studiously polite way of stating the undeniable truth that most of Black Africa today is controlled by grubby little gangsters who impose appalling tyrannies on their fellow Blacks at the behest of those who control them behind the scenes.

It surely has not yet become impermissible to state the obvious and well known facts about the political instability of Black Africa, but it would seem that it is impermissible to suggest reasons why there is this instability — which is almost as bad. Could it not be argued that, even if we do not make any deductions from the evidence that Whites are mentally superior to Blacks (as we are not permitted to do), we may nevertheless state that the mental structures of the two races are fundamentally different, and that it is therefore quite wrong to expect Africans to be able to operate political systems devised by, and for, Europeans — just as it would be wrong to expect Europeans to be able to govern the kinds of tribal societies traditional to Africans.

The statement that some Black African states are not in full control of their own affairs, and the implication that this is connected with differing mental capacities is therefore surely quite reasonable when we consider that these Africans have been called upon to administer states in accordance with European models which are entirely alien to their own native tradition and mentality. It is not 'insulting' to Africans to state such a thing, anymore than it would 'insulting' to Europeans to state that their brain type is not suited to governing their affairs in accordance with African tribal customs.

Perhaps I may be permitted to quote one more notable authority, and this is a report of the Annual Meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1961, which said: "No contribution to the arts of civilisation has come from Africa, which has produced nothing but destruction and ruinous exploitation of its natural resources." It might be added that the report obviously refers to civilisation of the European type; it does not imply that the African does not have his own particular civilisation, vastly different though this may be from ours.

DIFFERENT BRAIN FUNCTION

One of the world's greatest authorities on the human brain is Dr. J.C. Carothers. In his book The Brain and its Functioning, he says: "...the African with his lack of total synthesis must, therefore, use his frontal lobes but little, and all the peculiarities of African psychiatry can be envisaged in terms of frontal idleness." The same authority, writing in the Journal of Mental Science, Vol. XCVII at page 31, observed that: "The first and most striking point is a failure to see an event as an element in a total situation, and as having a variety of relevant relationships. The second point is a continual tendency to follow routine procedures in an unreasoning fashion. The third point is a lack of interest and attention unless the situation appeals in a directly personal and emotional fashion."

Dr. Wesley Critz George was a world-famous biologist. In his pamphlet The Biology of the Race Problem he said: "Through all recorded time the Negro never invented the wheel, the sail, the plough or a system of writing. He never produced a great religious leader or philosopher..." And in Racial Contours Isherwood expressed much the same thought when he said: "Such inborn cerebral discrepancies in the Negro could result in ability to perceive rather than to conceive, with a capacity to ape rather than to create, a good memory, a love of words and music, little liking for abstract thought, with few mathematical aptitudes, an inclination rather to take short views than long ones..."

We may leave the last word to Prof. E.A. Hooton, in his book Crime and the Man, written in 1939: "Whatever may be the sociological value of the legal fiction that 'all men are born free and equal,' there can be no doubt that the author of this phrase deserves above all other men the description splendide mendax, translated by the English schoolboy as 'lying in state.' In its biological application, at any rate, this statement is one of the most stupendous falsehoods ever uttered by man through his misbegotten gift of articulate speech."

So it seems that the case against the hapless ex-Mayoress of the Vale of Glamorgan is not well founded. She should seek reinstatement, for she has a very weighty body of highly learned and authoritative opinion on her side — or is such opinion now to be silenced and the written records of it torn up, in case it may be thought to endanger good 'race relations'?

people of British stock have achieved is quite simply beyond compare).

What is badly needed is a change of focus and a reordering: a policy that dismisses out of hand conventional wisdom (after all, as everyone knows, the sun revolves around the earth) and, with open-eyed realism and fervour, goes out and performs the 'impossible'. Where there is a will...

The Far South offers an excellent opportunity to embark on a truly noble endeavour. It is a worthy focus of a national effort that could not help but capture the popular imagination, while at the same time being an enormous national asset. Every country needs tangible external interests and goals. The current foreign policy of pouring irretrievable millions into that collection of lost causes known as the 'New Commonwealth' (the wealth is anything but common) satisfies no-one; neither the overtaxed citizen at home nor the owners of the ungrateful grasping hands in these 'independent' welfare countries has benefitted from it.

But as the foundation of real national independence is sovereignty — unquestioned and absolute — it is vital that all issues of this kind be settled as soon as possible. One of these questions involves the stationing of foreign troops on British overseas territories. And, as tiny Panama renegotiated the Panama Canal Treaty on demand in the 1970s, so it is high time for Great Britain to do some renegotiating of its own for the return of the borrowed lands.

National Front in 'Bloody Sunday' clash

THE PHOTO THAT SAYS IT ALL
National Front members give communist salute at public demo

SIR: Appropos of James Thurgood's article last month about the 'reddening of the National Front', I expect that many old NF members, and many readers of your magazine, will have seen the picture on the front page of the Sunday Telegraph of the 31st January, showing Front members at a demonstration giving the clenched-fist salute. Even the attendant policemen must have been bewildered!

This development confirms what John Tyndall has been saying about the degeneration of his old movement. So sad.

SIR: A.J.P. Taylor has long been our best-publicised contemporary historian. Could part of the reason for his status reside in his 'discretion-the-better-part-of-valour' attitude towards certain 'tricky' subjects? I quote from page 88 of Taylor's An Old Man's Diary, written in late 1982:-

"The events in the Lebanon I refrain from discussing for a different reason. Years of experience have taught me that one should never venture an opinion, favourable or unfavourable, on events concerned in any way with Israel or the Jews. Any attempt at a detached view opens the way for letters, telegrams, personal expostulations and, above all, telephone calls — what the late Sir Lewis Namier called 'the terror by telephone'. He was himself a skilled operator of this weapon and claimed to have reduced more than one critic of Zionism to a nervous breakdown. The only safe course is never, never, never to have any opinion about the Middle East. This is the course I propose to follow."

So Taylor could be allowed his little 'eccentricities' in writing of his belief that there was no evidence that Hitler ever planned aggressive war, which revision upsets the entire verdict of the Nuremberg Tribunal — plus his hint that Britain and France started World War II by declaring it. The establishment could overlook these quirks, it would seem. Perhaps David Mellor should have a quite chat with AJP.

SIR: I enclose a press cutting (from the Sunday Post) in which you will see reference to "Israel's privileged right of access to European Community markets."

I wonder how many people are aware of this? Who decides it? I do not recall reading of any debate about this, either in the Commons or in the European Parliament!

So Britain can exclude White Commonwealth food products and deny access to European markets to former loyal allies, but we must break the rules of the European Community to appease the Zionist lobby.

SIR: Could you please explain just what 'Gay Rights' mean? Do they mean that homosexuals have the right to assault our police with sticks, banners and bottles (as seen on ITV, 9.30 p.m., January 9th)? Do 'Gay Rights' give these people the right to go around spreading incurable diseases?

I recently read in a newspaper article that the 'Gay Centre' in Manchester receives £23,000 a year of the rate-payers' money — just for the 'gays' to meet and enjoy themselves. I also read in the same paper that orphaned and molested children were being neglected due to lack of cash to pay the wages of the social workers needed to look after them.

Personally, I am greatly disturbed to think that rate-payers' money is being used to help spread homosexuality and, with it, AIDS. I would feel much better knowing that such money was going to help these needy children. I am sure all rate-payers and tax-payers will agree with me.

BUILDING FUND: £5,377 NEEDED!

The total sum raised in contributions to the BNP Headquarters Building Fund during the last month is £710. No less than £500 of this comes from two sources. In one case, there is £200 from a donor who wishes to remain anonymous but to whom we are nevertheless most grateful. The other £300 comes from Liverpool BNP — to whom also many thanks!

This means that £5,377 remains still to be raised.

We hope that in the next month all supporters will dig deep into their pockets and do their very best to raise more. We have set ourselves the target of acquiring our HQ building sometime this year. If all pull their financial weight, this CAN be done!

All contributions should be marked 'Headquarters Fund' and sent to: PO Box 446, London SE23 2LS.

THE EXODUS THAT WASN'T

It has come to our notice during the past month that leading officials of the 'Flag' faction of the National Front have been circulating rumours obviously directed at members of the British National Party and alleging widespread defections on the part of BNP branches and individuals to the NF. Included in these rumours are the claims that the South Wales, Plymouth, Leeds and Doncaster units of the BNP have left us and joined the Front, also that former BNP North of England Chairman Stanley Clayton-Garnett has enlisted in the NF.

We have checked these rumours and found them to be wholly untrue. The former Plymouth unit of the BNP did sever its connections with the party at the end of 1986 but it has definitely not joined the NF. The other units mentioned are still with the BNP. As for Mr. Clayton-Garnett, he did resign his position as North of England Chairman of the BNP last December for health reasons but still works to help the party in a non-official capacity, and he informed our Editor only a week prior to going to press that he has not the slightest intention of joining the NF.

COMING RALLIES

The first two major events in the British National Party calendar for 1988 will be as follows:-

Saturday, 16th April
Public rally
NORWICH

Saturday, 30th April
Public rally
BIRMINGHAM
St. George's Day Rally

Both these rallies are being staged in support of BNP candidates standing in local government elections due in early May. It is hoped that party activists from all over the country will make the very maximum efforts to attend. Already in Norwich the increased BNP presence there has sparked off a panic among local left-wingers, and last month a meeting was held in the city to co-ordinate the 'anti-fascist' campaign there — always a good omen that nationalists are making an impact!

We hope to have more precise details of the two rallies in next month's issue, but all activists who keep in touch with their branches will be informed in good time.

THE BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY recording company BNP Recordings is pleased to announce the availability of its first video-recording, which is out this month.

The recording is entitled 'Rally '87' and is a film of the BNP rally in London held on the 31st October last year.

On the film you can hear speakers Ronald Rickcord (chairman of the meeting), Ian Sloan, Gus McLeod, Richard Edmonds, Dr. Peter Peel, Stanley Clayton-Garnett, David Bruce and John Tyndall. Mr. Tyndall's speech is filmed almost in its entirety.

'Rally '87' is the first of what is intended to be a series of video-films produced by the BNP. It costs £18 plus £1 for packing and postage. At the moment the video is only being made to play at British speeds but it is hoped shortly to make a version available which will play at American speeds. When we have more news on this, readers in the United States will be informed.

Please send orders with cash to: BNP Recordings, PO Box 446, London SE23 2LS.

DON'T FORGET SUBS!

British National Party members who have not yet sent in their subscriptions for 1988 are requested to do so as soon as possible.

Recruitment up in 1988!

IN THE FIRST FEW WEEKS of 1988 there has been a noticeable increase in the rate of new recruits coming into the British National Party. After a long period of very slow recruitment, the rate of applications for membership has quickened considerably, as has also the rate at which people are writing in asking for information about the party.

There is no doubt whatsoever that this is due to the greater sense of urgency with which BNP active units around the country have been applying themselves to the task of literature distribution, following the training seminars and lectures on the subject delivered by party leaders last year.

The BNP now has the largest and most varied range of leaflets, posters and stickers to serve as publicity aids that it has ever had. In addition, it has now introduced a bigger and better British Nationalist newspaper, with an extra colour and a middle-insert advertising all other BNP products.

During recent weeks, Leicester and Liverpool areas have been the ones to see the greatest rates of recruitment and of enquiries about membership, and this indicates a vigorous rate of activity in both areas. Around most of the rest of the country, however, there are signs of much increased activity. Already things are proceeding in the right direction for the realisation of the aim, put forward by the BNP leader in his new year's message in the January issue, of a 50 per-cent increase in membership size in 1988. Let's keep the pace up!

SUPPORT FUND

Although the production costs of our magazine have been considerably reduced by the acquisition of typesetting equipment, these are still greater than is our income from sales and subscriptions. We therefore still rely very much on donations to our regular support fund.

Please send all contributions to PO Box 446, London SE23 2LS. Should anyone require a receipt for a contribution of under £10, would they please supply SAE.

THE CHANGING FACE OF BRITAIN

The smaller photo seen here was taken in 1962. It is of a class at Kingsbury County Grammar School in North West London, and was kept as a memento by one of the pupils in that class (encircled in the picture). The larger photo is of the same class taken in 1987. Note Whites are now in the minority!

THE SMALL SCREEN MEN by Sniper

The light comes on, the screen goes 'live';
It's news time once again!
And, all aglow with liberal cant,
The piffers scoff and feign.

All the news that's fit to tint
With trendy black or red
Is trimmed and filed by each slick hack,
To truth and honour dead.

They are the friends of all our foes,
The foes of all our friends;
And all is slanted, shaped or cut
To serve their 'liberal' ends.

No use to write — they will not read;
Nor shout — they will not hear.
They live to serve an alien creed,
And at all else they sneer.

They are the oafs of perfidy,
The mockers and the queers;
And all their aim is anarchy,
To wreck the pride of years.

Think not they scarcely matter.
Because they merely grate;
They also serve the traitors' cause
Who only smarm and prate.

THOUGHT FOR THE MONTH

And then, when being is sufficiently uprooted and waking-being sufficiently strained, there suddenly emerges into the bright light of history a phenomenon that has long been preparing itself underground and now steps forward to make an end to the drama — the sterility of civilised man. This is not something that can be grasped as a plain matter of causality (as modern science naturally enough has tried to grasp it); it is to be understood as an essentially metaphysical turn towards death. The last man of the world-city no longer wants to live — he may cling to life as an individual, but as a type, as an aggregate, no, for it is a characteristic of this collective existence that it eliminates the terror of death. That which strikes the true peasant with an inexplicable fear, the notion that the family and the name may be extinguished, has now lost its meaning. The continuation of the blood-relation in the visible world is no longer a duty of the blood, and the destiny of being the last of the line is no longer felt as a doom. Children do not happen, not because children have become impossible, but principally because intelligence at the peak of intensity can no longer find any reason for their existence...When the ordinary thought of a cultivated people begins to regard 'having children' as a question of pros and cons, the great turning-point has come. For nature knows nothing of pro and con. Everywhere, wherever life is natural, reigns an inward organic logic, an 'it', a drive that is utterly independent of waking-being...
